Monthly commentary – September 2021

By Christian Nygaard and Ole Jørgen Grøneng Nilsen

September was a weak month for the Nordic market, and the fund performed in line. Higher global interest rates, rising uncertainty about the Chinese real estate market and a flurry of news about congested supply chains may all contribute to weaker profit growth for Nordic companies.

The best contributors to the fund in September were Storebrand, benefitting from higher interest rates, and Fortum, on the back of electricity prices hitting levels not seen since 2010.

Nordhealth, a leading Practice Management Software (PMS) company in the veterinary and therapy niches, contributed positively in September after delivering a solid first report after the IPO. The company grew recurring revenue by 124 per cent year-over-year in the first half, mainly driven by the acquisition of the Norwegian company Aspit. The organic growth of 36 per cent was driven equally by net upselling to existing customers and new customer recruitments.

The software provider is targeting close to EUR 25 million of annual recurring revenue at year end. We are excited about the value creation opportunity in capturing the shift from legacy on-premise or hosted PMS to cloud-based PMS through a combination of M&A and organic growth.

Stora Enso, the Finnish forestry company, together with Academedia, the private education group based in Sweden, had the most negative impact on the return in September.

Stora Enso is on the right track in terms of capital allocation and operations but is suffering from weak pulp prices in China. The country accounts for two thirds of the global pulp demand growth and imports most of the necessary volumes. Troubled logistics, which is impacting companies across the world, has reduced Chinese exports of paper and packaging board, leading to a temporary halt in pulp purchases.

We remain optimistic about the company's future. Its € 150 million annual research and development budget is starting to materialise in tangible products. They recently presented ambitious plans to replace polluting graphite in battery anodes with carbon from lignin, a by-product in the pulp process. Apart from boosting capital return and profits for the company, this environmentally friendly product also contributes to better battery performance than current products do.

Since buying Academedia, we have been aware of the political risk from left-leaning parties working to ban profits for private education providers. This month, the Swedish minority government's Minister for Education said that her party's board will propose to a congress later this year that the Social Democrats implement a profit cap for private education companies. Thereby, this issue may become central in the 2022 parliamentary election. Currently, about 60 per cent of the delegates are against such a cap.

Close to 20 per cent of Swedish pupils attend private schools with public grants, slightly higher than the OECD average. The value of the company is in our view highly attractive assuming no such cap, but we will continuously monitor the share price against polls leading up to next year's elections.
