Monthly commentary - July 2022

By Christian Nygaard and Ole Jørgen Grøneng Nilsen

July ended with the funds' net value at a higher level. As we discussed last month, the market's fear of higher interest rates culminated in June. Now an important issue is whether we will see a severe economic recession as a result of high inflation and the increased interest rates. We believe lower volumes for some industries are unavoidable, but whether that will lead to a recession is less certain.

Our focus during July has been directed towards the second quarter reports from quite a few of the Nordic companies that we follow. The main take-aways are positive. A common denominator is good revenue growth and order intake. Higher costs cancel out the revenue growth for some, but most companies report higher profits compared to the same quarter last year.

Regarding important issues for the future, we typically hear from top management in companies in industrial segments that "we still do not see any weakness in demand, but we are preparing the organisation for it" and "the challenges to sourcing and logistics peaked in the second quarter and will gradually improve during the year". These are quite positive statements.

On the other hand, companies selling discretionary consumer products have a tougher market situation. Several are now starting to downgrade volume expectations. The market has sent the share price of many of those down by half, and we believe that when management finally warns about weaker demand, we do expect some attractive entry points to emerge. We currently have very limited exposure to this category of companies.

Obviously, any new portfolio company will have to meet our other investment criteria apart from valuation: long term credible revenue growth, strong capital returns and wise capital allocation, active owners and products that contribute to solving global challenges.
