Monthly commentary – April 2022

By Christian Nygaard and Ole Jørgen Grøneng Nilsen

The fund was virtually flat in April, slightly better than the broader Nordic equity market. The focus of the month was directed towards the companies' reports for the first quarter. About half of the companies in the portfolio have reported. The general observation is revenues and profits continue to grow. The most striking element is, however, very strong order intake growth (for those companies where this measure is relevant). We ascribe most of this growth to hoarding behaviour. Customers accelerate purchases in advance of price hikes, which are abnormally large and frequent, and to secure delivery in time. We believe this effect will backfire during the year and, obviously, avoid companies which have been rewarded excessively for delivering order intake growth.

The winner of the month was Essity. The share price of this hygiene and health products company has been under heavy pressure this year as meaningful and persistent input cost inflation has taken its toll on margins. Management has been determined to implement price hikes to fully compensate for higher costs, but the time lag between higher prices in versus out has made the investment community skeptical to the company's pricing power.

But the skeptics were proven wrong. Essity came back with a vengeance in the first quarter and exceeded the market's operating profit estimate by some 20 per cent. Price hikes and volume growth contributed in equal parts to the impressive 15 per cent organic revenue growth. We have added to our large position throughout this challenging period, as we have observed Essity managing these cycles successfully in the past. Our patience was finally rewarded in April, and we believe the rerating is just getting started. Topline momentum and margin recovery are set to be strong, and multiples are still well below peers.

The runner-up was Coor, the pan-Nordic facilities services company. The company delivered a good first quarter report, and the share price has been supported by the stability of revenues and profits and much less uncertainty related to sourcing of input components, which is restricting most parts of the economy these days.

Nykode, a promising clinical-stage biopharmaceutical company, was the biggest loser in the fund in April. With limited revenues and negative profits for still some years to come, the company is an obvious prey in an increasingly skeptical stock market where high multiple companies are slaughtered.

Nordic Semiconductor was the second-weakest link in the portfolio and victim to the same dynamics as Nykode. This company has been frequently discussed among other winners in our monthly reports over many years. Revenues grew by 50 per cent in 2021 and without limited supply of wafers we believe they could have matched that level also this year. Instead, revenue growth now seems to end up in the 30 to 40 per cent range. We added to our position around the lowest point in the middle of the month and have already been well rewarded as the strong first quarter report, released at the end of April, boosted the share price by ten per cent.
