April was quite a turbulent month, with US President Trump pointing at Europe and the rest of the world, threatening with much higher tariffs. Nevertheless, Pareto Nordic Equity performed relatively well, falling less than the Nordic benchmark VINX.

Reporting season has started, and approximately half of the portfolio companies have reported quarterly numbers. It is encouraging to see them reporting good numbers with continued operating profit growth overall. Although we live in an uncertain world and do not know where tariffs will end, we are not worried about our portfolio companies, as the vast majority of revenues from North America have local production.

Securitas, the fund's largest position, was one of the best stocks in the portfolio in April. The stock is considered defensive and not exposed directly to tariffs as its services for the North American market are locally generated. However, some undisclosed impact from tariffs within Securitas Technology's offering still exists. The recent uptick in the share price can also be explained by increasing investor appetite, as there is more need for security solutions in an uncertain world with a larger risk of sabotage.

Another company that performed well in April is Novonosis, a market leader in enzymes and bio-solutions used in around 40+ industries. Novonosis peers have reported generally positive results, and we expect the company to continue its growth and profitability trajectory.

Novo Nordisk continues to be hit by positive news flows from its competitor Eli Lilly, which reported solid numbers on its oral obesity medicine in April. Nevertheless, we believe the fall in the stock price is an overreaction. Positive news flow from Novo Nordisk and the American pharmacy company Hims and Hers Health came out late April saying that the companies will collaborate long-term on distributing and selling obesity medicines. The collaboration is designed to make proven obesity care and treatments more accessible and affordable to Americans. We consider the news positive as we are confident that this will lead to increased market penetration and relatively quickly increase the supply.
